Lawyer Jennings and Miss Emma Borden came up this morning, and the former after a brief conversation went away, leaving Emma in the cell with her sister. The two conversed in low tones for some time, but there were no tears, no complaining, and the whole affair had the appearance of a simple, ordinary, every-day visit between friends.

During part of the time Lizzic was occupied with some sewing which she had brought with her. It is understood that under no circum stances will she open her mouth, and Mr. Jennings, her counsel, will do all the talking necessary.

A few cool-headed ones tried to persuade their excited and panic-stricken fellow passengers that the danger would not be great, as they were only a short distance from shore, and Capt. Charles A. Pearce did his best to reassure them, with but little success for half of them were frightened out of their wits, and the women especially were terror-stricken and clung frantically to their husbands and friends.
